EXCERPTS:

Wilkerson said she will always remember the look on the detective's face when he told her the suspect in custody, Hermilio Moralez, was not in America legally.

"I'll never forget looking in that detective's eyes as he was telling me, 'yeah this kid is in the country illegally,'" Mrs. Wilkerson told the crowd in Richmond. "I said 'where are his parents?' He said, 'we can't ask him.' He couldn't ask them because it was a sanctuary city at that time. I thought, 'really? You could pull me over and ask me any question under the sun, legally, but you can't ask that?' It just made no sense to me. It stuck in my head forever.

After two years of waiting for a trial, the Wilkersons finally got more answers and saw Moralez convicted in January of this year. At the trial, she said, "the horror was just incredible."

"We found out later that what he [Hermilio Moralez] did was he asked Josh for a ride home from school and Josh said, 'sure,'" Mrs. Wilkerson said. "I think he'd given him a ride home two or three times before. He took him actually to his parents' house. For some reason, we found out later why, what he did to Josh was he hit him in the nose, and this is what the kid tells from the stand, he hit him in the nose so hard that it would blind him so that he couldn't fight back. Then he kicked him so hard in the stomach. Josh was about this big around and he weighed about 100 pounds in the body bag. He kicked him so hard in the stomach that his liver sliced in two and his spine sliced in two. He ruptured his spleen. He took a closet rod and beat Josh over the head so hard with it that it broke in four pieces. He strangled him, then let him go. Strangled him, let him go. Per the medical examiner, it was just torturous. After he murdered him, as he said, when Josh quit having bloody bubbles come out of his nose, he knew he was gone, he tied him up like an animal with about 13 ropes from his the back of his neck to the back of his hands, to the back of his feet. He covered his head with his school shirt. Then he put him in the back of my son's truck and he drove around and he took two dollars out of Josh's wallet and he stopped and bought gas. Then he took him to a field and he took his wallet and school ID out and just placed it by the body. Then he doused him with gas and set him on fire. It was just incredible. You just don't even believe something like this will happen to your family, let alone to just your kid. What we saw in the beginning of the trial, in the opening, was the police going out to this itty bitty trail and there you saw, when they finally got to Josh, you finally saw him in the fetal position, barefooted, charred, bound up. The policeman said he looked like a doll. He didn't even look real. He looked so tiny. Then after that in the trial the next picture was of his face after they removed his shirt. It was horribly disfigured by the closet rod. So one of the last pictures I saw of Josh was one where his face is just — one of his eyebrows is here, and the other is very low. It's something you don't want to be reminded of.”

Mrs. Wilkerson said that during the trial, Morales “was proud on the stand.”

“He got up there and said he was trained to kill and that Josh had kicked his dog and that his killing skills took over,” she said. “From the stand, he said his culture was very different than ours. And he really was excited about what he had done. He never once showed any amount of remorse or sorrow for what he did to Josh.”
